1. There's a heated, controversial debate at SNHU. The university has a foundation that invests its money in various stocks, bonds and properties. A reporter for the Penmen Press uncovered that some of the money is invested in tobacco companies. Now students are calling for the foundation to eliminate those stocks from its investment portfolio. When interviewed, Paul Leblanc stated that "Cigarettes have been responsible for millions of deaths, and owning shares in the companies that produce them sends a conflicting message to both students and the public." The Board of Trustees met at 8 a.m. this morning, and the topic was one of several on its agenda. It voted 8-1 that the foundation not be ordered to sell any of its tobacco stocks.
2. Five SNHU campus students, all members of a fraternity, Alpha Alpha Alpha, have been arrested as the result of a hazing incident. The investigation began after one pledge was hospitalized Saturday with serious internal injuries and another with a sprained back. Each of the five students was charged with two counts of battery. The incident occurred during a fraternity meeting Friday at which members "beat pledges with wooden paddles and canes and subjected them to other forms of physical and verbal punishment," according to Detective Sgt. Albert Wei. One of the two injured students, sophomore Roland Philips, was hospitalized for kidney damage and dehydration. Another sophomore, Eddie Muldaur, was treated for a sprained back. Hospital officials notified the police and, as the investigation continued, four other pledges were taken to the hospital and also examined, then released. Several suffered contusions, Wei said. A university spokesman said both university and national fraternity officials are investigating to determine what disciplinary action, if any, should be taken against the fraternity.
